When her head is on the pillow, say, after her prayers, when she has thought of any devotional texts that she is reading at the moment, when she has been especially receptive to the will of God, then she knows that what she hears is a light or a voice that is saying to her, 'I know all that you are doing, and I love you, and I will give you that which is just.' At that point she thinks, 'If I were only a woman! I would be at peace.' And she remembers a certain woman whom she knows to be in a thousand times worse a position than she, and then she prays, 'I will become like this woman in the eyes of God and then He will be satisfied with me as with her.' She begins to give away all her worldly goods, and by and by, as if a mother who had given birth, she gives birth to a son, a sign and proof of her submission to God. She loves to see people become happy and at peace. So, if she has become a prostitute, she goes to the highest house in the place, and, if she has become a martyr, she will go to the highest house in the town. To me, I think this was a very important part of the story, because he was asked in another episode to express what he was learning on a deeper level and to show this in his painting. I didn't want to give him a lot of paper and just let him do his work, so I thought we would do this by getting some of his writings, showing them to him, and then we would figure out what he was learning. I would read out a paragraph, and he would start working on it, adding to it, changing it, and then he would read it back to me. Proverbs 22:6 "a man who flatters his neighbor is spreading slander".
